Newsletter for TRIO Day 2006

Deltha Q. Colvin,
TRIO Director, Assistant

Student Affairs

The agenda for National TRIO Day 2006 is filled with motivational sessions and a team of exciting speakers. Most presenters are current and former participants in Wichita State University's (WSU) TRIO programs. Presenter Brian Black is a former TRIO participant in the South Carolina Talent Search program.

We are very proud of the individuals who have participated in one of the seven programs and look forward to them sharing their experiences with current middle and high school students. TRIO has helped thousands of individuals complete secondary and postsecondary, prepare for future careers, realize the importance of their future, and promote a desire to give back to the community that helped them realize their goals and dreams.

Featured speaker Luis Ibarra will share his vast experience and motivate students to take the future seriously and gather as much experience as possible to make themselves more marketable as they prepare to advance in a diverse society.

This year's TRIO Fair will give students the opportunity to talk with program staff to decide if they would like to explore other options available. The Disability Track is embarking on an effort to train faculty to better address the needs and issues of person with disabilities. We look forward to having our guests and students join us for an exciting day filled with the opportunity for personal and professional growth. The Blueprint for a Lifetime of Success is an ongoing evolving plan.

How Collaboration during TRIO Day Assists the Programs

The Federally funded TRIO programs provide educational outreach and support to low-income and potential first-generation college students to enable them to graduate from high school and continue in post-secondary educational institutions. Wichita State University hosts seven TRIO programs, the State-wide Kansas Kids @ GEAR UP program and the Office of Disability services (ODS). The programs provide comprehensive activities and support to students from kindergarten to college and even up to a doctoral degree.

The National TRIO Day event is an attempt to showcase these programs and their mission. The hallmark of TRIO Day celebrations is the collaborative efforts of nine programs within the Office of Special Programs (OSP) to come together and provide well-organized and quality sessions addressing a diverse population.

Collaboration among the programs within the OSP is not an effort, but a culture. The National TRIO Day event is a manifestation of the united efforts of these programs to best serve the interests of the students. The main advantages that the Special Programs office enjoys because of collaboration are: heightened program quality and vitality, exhaustive use of limited resources, broadened perspectives on concepts and practices, and extended outreach and visibility.

Heightened program quality: Collaboration across these programs allows thorough review and effective program planning. The National TRIO Day event with a history of experienced program staff enables to critically review the program organization, sessions, speakers, and other aspects of the day. Experienced colleagues share success stories and caution against past problems. Newer colleagues bring fresh perspectives to the table. By introducing the aspect of systematic and scientific evaluation of the program, a sustained effort is made to continue to improve the quality of the TRIO Day event.

Exhaustive use of limited resources: Increased costs of accessories along with a steady decline in funding and existing resources can create challenges in organizing an event. Collaboration encourages sharing of resources, and sharing not only increases the use but also the value of the resources. For instance, during the National TRIO Day, transportation costs, when shared among the programs, helps to transport students belonging to different programs in adjacent areas, and thereby cuts cost and the time that human personnel require to chauffeur them. Similarly, by pooling in monies, it has become possible to reserve a spacious facility for the event and provide for well-known speakers at a competitive price.

Broadened perspectives on concepts and practices: When all the TRIO and GEAR UP programs were viewed together, the programs reflect a truly contiguous picture in their support to the students. While it is possible that the program administrators and staff, because of their continuous association with other programs, may have already got a broad perspective on their impact, collaboration changes the way the program clientele and the community at large look towards these programs. Students belonging to the program become aware of other similar programs and also explore future programs that may continue helping them in their educational pursuits. It also builds a sense of community among the students. The larger community beyond the programs, also get an impression of these programs as those with a common mission and strong commitment to the cause of low-income and potential first generation students.

Extended outreach and visibility: One of the outcomes of collaboration is increased outreach and visibility. Cooperation among programs, because of the sharing of resources, helps the programs to reach the farthest sections of the society and provide program services. Also, collaboration leads to increase in numbers and activities. This increase in size is noticed by the community and the media. In a democracy where numbers matter, collaboration is an important aspect for political lobbying. The 2005 TRIO Day event, as covered by the local media, illustrated how collaboration could help communicate the success stories and positive impact of the programs at the local, state and national level.

The 2005 Let's Talk TRIO – Spring Newsletter discussed that learning communities are groups where members engage in meaningful learning activities, and develop a sense of responsibility towards creating and belonging to a community of peers. Collaboration among TRIO, GEAR UP and Office of Disability Services is an important factor towards creating a learning community among the student population. It has and continues to increase intellectual interaction among students and the program staff, permeates the group with a sense of community success, and provides for maximum impact without compromising program quality. The National TRIO Day event is a testimony of this collaborative effort.
